Construction defects are common, though most defects are minor and fairly inconsequential. However, the most dangerous defects could risk damage to either people or the property itself. Regardless of whether a defect is major or minor in nature, a problem remains: defects typically aren’t discovered until long after completion of the work, and defending against defect claims is a tall (and expensive) task.

Construction defect claims inspire a lot of the litigation in the New York and Florida construction world. Generally speaking, such claims allege that defects in the planning, design, workmanship, and/or materials or systems used on a project caused some kind of financial harm to the owner. Courts tend to place defects into one of four categories, each of which can form the basis for a claim.

Construction Claims: 4 Common Causes of Defect Claims ...

A construction defect claim is a claim for damages (money) arising out of a defect in construction, including design, workmanship, and materials. The defect can, but not necessarily, cause damage (or physical injury) to the work itself, to other work or property, or to both.

For latent defects, the deadline (“statute of repose”) is 10 years from the completion of the business’ work. Claims for construction defects must be made during these timeframes – otherwise, they can’t be brought at all. This is true even if the defect isn’t discovered until 10+ years after the project is complete. This timeframe for making a claim, itself, was not actually amended by the recent Florida legislation. The 4 and 10-year time limits for claims remain intact.

For 17 years, the Construction Defect Action Reform Act (C.R.S. § 13-20-801, et. Seq.) or “CDARA”, has governed how construction defect litigation and arbitration actions are conducted in Colorado. While portions of this act are reasonably straightforward, several of the sections are subject to ongoing debate as to how these concepts should be applied to achieve fair and unbiased results.

A Short Summary of the Colorado Construction Defect Action ...

Construction Defect is a two-word phrase that has taken on a life of its own over the past 20 years. To be clear, construction defect claims have existed ever since construction projects began, but the construction boom of the 1990’s dramatically increased the amount of construction defect claims that made their way into the courts.
