Ohio presents a unique subject for research, since it combines elements of both types. I sought to determine the relationship between party-line voting (voters choosing candidates from their own party) in Ohio Supreme Court races and information levels present in the races. As voters acquire

Online Library Political Party Identification

more information about a race, will they be more or less likely to vote for the candidate from their own party? There are two parallel issues here--the amount of political knowledge that a voter brings to an election, and the amount of information that is actually available in a given race. I

Second, there were slight differences in party voting levels among groups of voters based on education and knowledge, with the higher- education and knowledge respondents showing higher rates of party voting. And finally, increases in information levels
